Compositions for topical application for providing protection against skin ageing or maintaining the skin hydration level are generally marketed in the form of creams or lotions. However, moisturizing creams and lotions normally contain a high content of water and it has been found that a high water content can, over a prolonged period of time, lead to the skin becoming "slimy". Furthermore, these types of topical compositions require an ample supply of oil to maintain the lipids in a permeable condition. If there is insufficient oil, the skin can become "dry". It has now been found that compositions comprising one or more polyunsaturated fatty acids (PUFAs), in particular comprising polyunsaturated triglycerides, not only provide excellent moisturization to the skin but also improve the appearance of wrinkles and provide protection from skin ageing, and maintain the skin hydration level.Q: Will releasing a few services have a negative effect on further releases? We are about to release a few services to production that are needed, and they are not critical to our mission. We have several microservices that should have their own repository, but I want to know if releasing the services now will make further releases more complicated? We have some tests to perform before releasing to production, but we already have a few services in production, so we will not have to rebuild the whole application if we release. A: It depends on what exactly you have. If you don't release these services then it will most likely cost you a lot more time than if you do. If you have tests that involve these services then you should wait until the tests are complete. If the services are using a shared library that is not public then you'll have to rebuild the f988f36e3a
