How to Increase the Value of Your Restaurant's Best Assets In the past couple of years, we've seen a dramatic decline in the number of people going out to eat. People have become more health-conscious, and there are new trends like plated meals and home delivery. In the face of this, restaurant operators and corporate executives are having to make some difficult decisions. Well-known names that have struggled include Ruth's Chris Steakhouse and Trattoria Madia. The number of people going out for meals is continuing to decline, and, as a result, we're seeing more and more restaurants closing their doors. But, when looking at a restaurant as a business, the real value is not the number of people that eat there, but the revenue that comes in. We also value the quality of the food they serve. Both are important, and, with fewer customers coming through the doors, it makes sense to try to increase the value of your business assets. Here are three ways you can do that. Upgrade your physical space Over the last few years, we've seen countless restaurants open in substandard spaces, with few updates to the décor and a general lack of attention to detail. The worst offenders are usually the fast-food giants. We're talking McDonald's, Wendy's, Dunkin' Donuts, Burger King and Tim Horton's, to name but a few. While these restaurants may have an excellent menu with great service, it's a real shame that the quality of the actual food you get can vary so much. Once you're able to open your doors, you need to make sure you're getting the best out of your space. Think about what you want to say to your customers. Do they want to be treated like royalty, where everything is tasteful, where every detail is exceptional? Or do they just want to be able to order fast food and not have to worry too much about the food tasting good? You're not going to give the second option, and you might want to concentrate more on the quality of the
