Adobe got rid of the old Adobe art community-generated brushes in version 5/Fixes. It's possible that the license is such that the brushes will reappear if the user doesn't download and use them. This is a little unsettling to know, but I appreciated the removal of the brushes. Users should be given the choice to download or not download them. I could have done without the need to buy the brushes again since I already have a collection of them. I am torn between LR2 and 5.5. I keep "rebellin'" to LR2 because I like being able to work on old projects in an old (and sometimes rickety) software. That said, the new features in 5.5 are a breath of fresh air (development in a vacuum, no less). I would love to see a workflow that allows me to track changes in my Lr news, then "export" (dear Adobes!) the changes in the form of an "offset" version to my old (but better) Lr. I struggle with and appreciate the intentional performance impediments that are the hallmark of most modern consumer/mass-market products. Your work should be slow and stumble more gracefully than an engine truck.

Peace,

Sorin I was very happy with Photoshop CS6. It was buggy and slow at times, but it was what I had been waiting for. Thankfully, the bugs have been seriously reduced in the latest pre-release software.

Performance will once again be the reason I upgrade from CS6 to CS6.4. Who wants to manage a DRAM tear through the hundreds of gigabytes of all your images as you work? Although photoshop is the most robust, the crashes are there. Hopefully, they are all fixed before the final is released. I will continue to use CS6.4 until the software is ready for CS6.5.

Peace,

Sorin
