Cyantraniliprole is a novel, potent insect-specific neonicotinoid (NEO). It is an irreversible inhibitor of midgut chymotrypsin-like serine proteases. It has potent insecticidal activity against dipteran, lepidopteran, coleopteran, and hemipteran insects. In an effort to understand the factors that control the insecticidal activity of this neo-NEO, a serial dilution experiment was conducted in order to assess the toxicity of cyantraniliprole to fourth-instar larvae of Ostrinia furnacalis, Diprion spp., and Spodoptera littoralis. Adult houseflies were then mass-released at a density of 100/10(6) m³ into a non-flight period field cage trial using two Ostrinia-resistant strains with different susceptibilities to cyantraniliprole. The larvae died of mortality within 2-4 days after cyantraniliprole application. After the wild-type strain was mass-reared for 3 generations, it was observed that the larvae still lived in the absence of cyantraniliprole. This indicates that cyantraniliprole may lack an "inhibitor for insecticidal activity."The present invention relates to semiconductor devices, and more particularly, to semiconductor devices that have a substrate having a sawing edge. An array of field effect transistors (FETs) is fabricated on a semiconductor substrate. The FETs can be of metal oxide semiconductor type (MOSFET), which is fabricated on a substrate that includes a collector region. In MOSFETs, which are insulated gate field effect transistors, the source and drain regions thereof are typically formed by out-diffusing a dopant into the substrate. The thickness of the gate oxide is usually about 100 nanometers.
